The Old Curiosity Shop

Read by Anton Lesser
Chapter 1
‘Who has sent you so far by yourself?’

While we were sitting...

Kit, who in despatching...

Chapter 2
It was perhaps not very unreasonable...

‘Why do you hunt and persecute me, God help me!’

Chapter 3
Without waiting for the permission he sought...

Chapter 4
‘It’s all very fine to talk,’ said Mrs Quilp...

‘Go on, ladies…’

Chapter 5
It was flood tide...

It was a dirty little box...

Chapter 6
With that, Mr Quilp suffered himself...

Mrs Quilp departed according to order...

‘She’s tired you see, Mrs Quilp,’

Chapter 7
Richard Swiveller, who had been looking…

Chapter 8

Having made up his mind…

At this momentous crisis…

Hard by this corner…

Chapter 9

One night…

The old man answered…

‘I’m sorry I’ve got an appointment…’

Chapter 10

Not deriving from these means…

Chapter 11

‘How kind it is of you, Sir…’

One night, she had stolen…

Chapter 12

In a small dull yard…

From many dreams of rambling…

Chapter 13

‘Now, Mrs Quilp,’

By this time…
They went, as it was easy to tell...
There was a short silence...
Chapter 15
At length these streets...
They were now in the open country...
‘How far is it to any town or village?’
Chapter 16
While she was thus engaged...
The child left her gathering the flowers...
Mr Grinder’s company...
Chapter 18
Overpowered by the warmth...
In some versions of the great drama...
Chapter 19
The child began to be alarmed...
The public-houses by the wayside...
As the morning wore on...
Chapter 20
The faces had not disappeared...

Chapter 21

It would be difficult to say...

The summer-house...

Chapter 22

Kit looked about him...

Chapter 23

The dwarf had twice encountered him...

With his head sunk down...

Chapter 24

As they stood hesitating...

Chapter 25

Oh! How some of those idle fellows...

Towards night an old woman...

Chapter 26

It happened that at that moment...

While they were thus engaged...

Chapter 27

When she had brought...

Mrs Jarley was a little disconcerted...
The street beyond was so narrow...
Chapter 28
Mrs Jarley's back being then towards him...
When Nell knew all about Mr Packlemerton...
Chapter 29
One evening...
The landlord had placed a light...
Chapter 30
When she re-entered the room...
Chapter 31
She had no fear as she looked...
When they presented themselves...
A deep hum of applause...
Chapter 32
It was now holiday-time at the schools...
Chapter 33
One morning Mr Sampson Brass...
If Mr Quilp spoke figuratively...
Mr Swiveller pulled off his coat...
Chapter 34
He was occupied in this diversion…

Chapter 35

Mr Brass had evidently a strong inclination…

Chapter 36

Greatly interested in his proceedings…

Chapter 37

‘There are his boots, Mr Richard!’

Chapter 38

One circumstance…

Chapter 39

As Mr Swiveller was decidedly favourable…

Chapter 38

Their entertainer had sat perfectly quiet…

Chapter 39

One morning Kit drove Mr Abel…

Chapter 40

There was a simplicity in this confidence…

Chapter 41

As Whisker was tired of standing…

Chapter 40

Their entertainer had sat perfectly quiet…

Chapter 41

However, it was high time now…

Chapter 41

Kit did suffer one twinge…

Chapter 41

When they reached the Notary’s house…

Chapter 41
Ill-luck would have it…

His mother was not a little startled…

Chapter 42

There were no women or children…

Isaac List, with great apparent humility…

The remainder of their conversation…

Chapter 43

Nell was rather disheartened…

Not knowing…

Chapter 44

‘Speak again,’ it said…

The warmth of her bed…

When she awoke again…

Chapter 45

But night-time in this dreadful spot!

In the centre, stood a grave gentleman…

Chapter 46

The landlady, by no means satisfied…

They arranged to proceed upon their journey…

They admired everything…
Chapter 47
The single gentleman, rather bewildered...

Chapter 48
That Quilp lied most heartily in this speech...
Burning with curiosity...

Chapter 49
There were also present...

Chapter 50
Being roused in the morning...
Disguising his secret joy...
The first sound that met his ears...

Chapter 51
These complimentary expressions...
‘Don’t let’s have any wrangling,’ said Miss Sally...

Chapter 52
They repaired to the other tenement...
It was long before the child closed the window...
‘You are Mr Marton, the new schoolmaster?’

Chapter 53
‘What is it but a grave!’ said the sexton...
Chapter 54
Now, the man who did the sexton’s duty…
The second or third repetition of his name…
The poor schoolmaster made her no answer…

Chapter 55
It happened, that, as she was reading…

Chapter 56
Mr Chuckster paused, rapped the fox’s head…
Mr Brass and his lovely companion…
‘Kit,’ said Mr Brass, in the pleasantest way…

Chapter 57
Whenever Kit came alone…

Chapter 58
With this parting injunction…
The more he discussed the subject…

Chapter 59
‘Why don’t you leave him alone?’

Chapter 60
Absorbed in these painful ruminations…
The notary was standing before the fire…
‘Is it not possible,’ said Mr Witherden…

Chapter 61

During this melancholy pause…

Chapter 62

Now, the fact was, that Sampson…

Chapter 63

‘Discharge Mr Richard, sir?’

Chapter 64

Well; Richard took her home.

Chapter 65

‘Marchioness,’ said Mr Swiveller…

Chapter 66

At this point, Mr Swiveller…

Chapter 67

She had hardly taken this position…

Chapter 68

Dick received this project…

Chapter 69

‘Miss Brass,’ said the Notary…

Chapter 70

The charming creature…

Chapter 71

The three gentlemen looked at each other…

Chapter 72

‘Gentlemen,’ said Brass…
Chapter 67

These taunts elicited no reply…

While he was collecting a few necessaries…

Chapter 68

Well! In that place…

When the first transports…

Chapter 69

Little Barbara was not of a wayward…

‘There were once two brothers…

The Old Curiosity Shop was never intended to be a novel; it began life as a short story. In 1840 Dickens had decided to launch a new periodical entitled Master Humphrey’s Clock, containing a random selection of stories, satires and articles linked by ‘Master Humphrey’, who stored them in his clock for the enlightenment and enjoyment of his literary friends. This ‘club’ was reminiscent of Dickens’s first great success The Pickwick Papers. Nevertheless, the project was a gamble for Dickens; the stakes were high, and he was attempting to try something new on a weekly basis. The first issue introduced his narrator figure, Master Humphrey (Dickens himself, thinly disguised), who wanders the streets of London observing the day-to-day life there – its buildings and people.

At its first appearance Master Humphrey’s Clock sold 70,000 copies and it appeared that it might be a successful venture. Dickens had visions of earning £10,000 a year. However, by the third issue, public interest in a magazine that seemed to be merely a disparate and random collection of pieces had sharply fallen away. Dickens’s intuition told him his public was disappointed in him, and he set about making amends by abandoning Master Humphrey and his clock and writing a new full-scale novel in weekly instalments, based on a story Humphrey had already begun to tell, of a chance meeting with a face in the crowd – Little Nell.

The plight of Little Nell – an innocent child-victim, like Oliver Twist – had probably already prompted Dickens to start thinking... about expanding the ‘little child-story’ (as he referred to its first incarnation). The theme of childish innocence threatened, a major theme of his output, seemed to stimulate his creative powers, and the character of Little Nell came to obsess him at this time with the morbidity that always lay beneath the surface of his personality. Recent tragic events in his life encouraged this state of mind. Mary Hogarth, his wife’s youngest sister, moved into the Dickens household in 1836, shortly after his marriage. At seventeen she was taken ill after a family trip to the theatre and died suddenly in Dickens’s arms. He was shattered by the experience and wore a ring which he had taken off her dead finger for the rest of his life. In an excess of grief he kept her clothes and asked to be buried with her upon his death. He relived his grief in the creation of Little Nell, closely modeling her character on his ideal ‘child’ – Mary Hogarth.

In order to concentrate exclusively on writing the novel, Dickens took a house away from London at Broadstairs in Kent. He worked daily from seven o’clock in the morning to two o’clock in the afternoon uninterrupted – and the characters and ideas flowed. This was just as well, for he had set himself an arduous task in providing weekly instalments, rather than his usual monthly parts. Sometimes he was barely two weeks ahead of printing.

Dickens structured his book around a journey. A journey gives opportunities for improvisation week by week; anything can happen. This structure also pays tribute to the genre of the Picaresque novel – the novels of journeying and rambling such as Don Quixote and Humphrey Clinker were both influences from Dickens’s childhood reading. Nell and her Grandfather venture into the unknown landscape of Victorian England, pursued by the evil dwarf Quilp. The two innocents, wandering abroad without purpose or plan, discover a world full of as many curiosities as they have left behind in their shop. The countryside and the emerging industrial landscape of the Midlands and the North provide a backdrop to the story, whilst encounters with puppets, wax-works, giants, dwarfs and performing dogs provide a grotesque illusion of life, adding a fantastical dimension to Nell’s fears and dreams.
The journey seems to go by way of Hampstead through Buckinghamshire and Oxfordshire and on to Birmingham, where Dickens creates a picture of industry destroying nature: ‘...coal-dust and factory smoke darkened the shrinking leaves, and coarse rank flowers; and... the struggling vegetation sickened and sank under the hot breath of kiln and furnace...’

The journey may end in Shropshire, which Dickens once admitted was the county of Nell’s death, but he is deliberately imprecise as to topography (contributing to the book’s eeriness). City-born, there is no doubt that Dickens was more at home describing an urban scene than a rural one – he was no Thomas Hardy, though there is more of the country in this than in any other of Dickens’s novels. On one level the book is an allegorical journey – where innocence will be tested and tried, ultimately to fracture and break. The end is a foregone conclusion, pervading the whole book with a biblical tone. Little Nell has to be sacrificed. In an early chapter Nell identifies herself and her grandfather with Christian in Bunyan’s great allegorical tale of a man’s journey to salvation The Pilgrim’s Progress. Later, in her trials, fearing for her grandfather, Nell cries out, ‘What shall I do to save him?’, echoing Christian’s great lament.

With the allegorical, Dickens blends the grotesque and the naturalistic to create one of his most haunting and bizarre novels. The grotesque is represented by the misshapen dwarf Quilp and his twisted world of vice, intimidation and corruption. Dickens glories in Quilp’s excessive vulgarity – his deplorable habits, which both disgust and entertain. Quilp’s encounter with Little Nell is full of darkly perverse sexuality, and is brilliantly repulsive:

Quilp looked after her with an admiring leer, and when she had closed the door, fell to complimenting the old man upon her charms. ‘Such a fresh, blooming, modest little bud, neighbour,’ said Quilp, nursing his short leg, and making his eyes twinkle very much; ‘such a chubby, rosy, cosy, little Nell!’
Quilp provides a real sense of menace throughout the book with his manic energy, and his ability to turn up when least expected.

The character of Dick Swiveller links the two worlds of allegory and the grotesque, and represents a more natural and balanced view of the world. He was Dickens’s favourite character in the book. His burgeoning relationship with the Marchioness provides a heart to the novel. The Marchioness is never overly sentimental – the romance between her and Swiveller is underplayed, with always a vein of humour through the whole. Despite her physical frailty she is willing to face anything, and stands in pointed contrast to the heroine of the book, Little Nell. Nell is often morose, depressed and lacking in any sense of irony. As her grandfather rapidly diminishes into his second childhood, Nell is forced to develop rapidly from a child into a woman. The feckless grandfather sucks the life out of his granddaughter, and she never has the opportunity to develop her personality; she is an empty shell. With no prospect of life before her, she is morbidly drawn to graveyards and death-beds – ultimately her own. The Marchioness, like Nell, takes on the burden of responsibility for a weaker soul, in this case the wastrel Dick Swiveller, but the effect on the Marchioness is in vivid contrast to Nell’s situation. She blossoms in her care for Dick. She learns and grows from the experience. Her hard and cruel life as a Slavey does not result in the development of a morbid streak, but gives her strength to come to terms with change. She makes a success of her lot, becoming a lover, a wife and a mother. Unfortunately Dickens did not choose to develop her further, no doubt because her interesting character was in competition with his heroine’s.

The great set-piece of the novel is the death of Little Nell, and as the time approached to write it, Dickens was possessed with a kind of creative madness: ‘All night I have been pursued by the child, he wrote at the height of the novel’s creation. He cried as he wrote, as he felt inevitably that Nell would have to die. ‘I am slowly murdering the poor child,’ he wrote to the actor Macready. After he had written her death scene, the transferred emotion of his grief as he recalled Mary Hogarth’s death resulted in his getting a bad cold and an attack of rheumatism in his face. He seemed to have to experience these extremes of emotion to be able to write about them. There is no doubt he suffered for his art. ‘Nobody will miss her like I shall,’ he wrote to his friend Forster, who had been the first to suggest tentatively that Nell should die.

The world-wide response to the death of Little Nell is legendary. In New York, it was reported, passengers disembarking from England were asked eagerly: ‘Is Little Nell dead?’

England itself was in an ecstasy of imagined grief and wrote letters to Dickens bitterly complaining of his brutal decision to kill her, and begging him if it were not too late to change his mind. Grown men wept and women became hysterical. It was a new concept in 1840 to make a child the symbol of domesticity and security, which is all Nell wanted from life. The public seemed to need an expiation of its collective guilt; a child was left to roam the streets alone, uncared for, and vulnerable in a corrupt society of their making. The book’s pathos touched a nerve – innocence, Dickens seems to be saying, must die for the world to learn and move on. It belongs to a sentimental age: later generations would not be so moved by Nell’s protracted journey towards her end. It was Oscar Wilde who famously said: ‘You would need to have a heart of stone not to laugh at the death of Little Nell.’

The novel finished, Dickens was able to relax and say with confidence: ‘I think it will come famously.’

The character of Little Nell took the public by storm. They loved and pitied her with a passion, and by the end of the novel’s run the sales figures of Master Humphrey’s Clock had been raised to 100,000. The Old Curiosity Shop strengthened the bond between Dickens and his public: ‘It made a greater impression,’ Dickens said, ‘than any other of my writings.’

The Old Curiosity Shop

Death, innocence, sacrifice and corruption – The Old Curiosity Shop is vintage Dickens. Provoking an unprecedented outpouring of public grief when it was first published, it follows the story of Little Nell and her feckless grandfather. Forced to leave their magical shop of curiosities in London, they are pursued across the English countryside by the grotesquely evil dwarf Quilp. They escape – but at what cost? Part tragedy, part allegory, this is Dickens at his most intense; drawing on his own experiences, he weaves a story of extraordinary emotional power.

One of Britain’s leading classical actors, Anton Lesser is an associate artist of the Royal Shakespeare Company, where he has played many of the principal roles, including Romeo, Troilus, Petruchio and Richard III. A familiar voice on radio, he has become particularly associated with his award-winning readings of Dickens for Naxos AudioBooks.
